

Artem Linov <artem04linev@gmail.com>

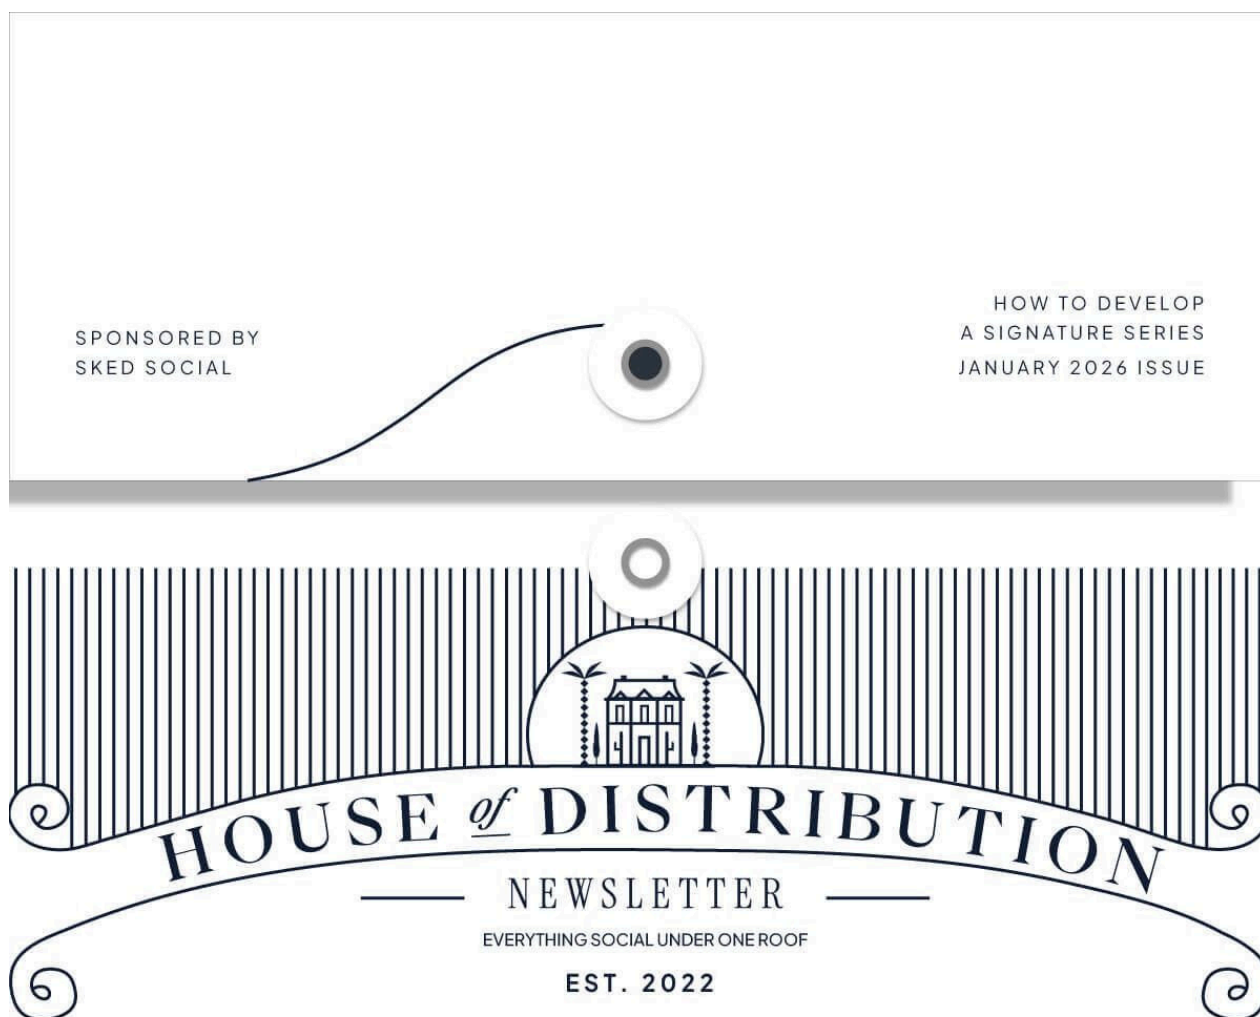

Volume 5: How To Develop A Signature Series

1 message

Alex Garcia <marketing-examined@mail.beehiiv.com>
Reply-To: Alex Garcia <alexg@marketingexamined.com>
To: "artem04linev@gmail.com" <artem04linev@gmail.com>

30 January 2026 at 03:48

January 29, 2026

In this edition, we're going to talk about how to develop a signature series. Not to confuse it with building a social show. They're cut from the same cloth but different at the same time.

Today, we're going to cover the three elements that make a great "signature series."

But two quick notes:

- Here's a 13 min youtube video with everything you need to know to build your brand's social show
- And thank you to Sked Social, who helps us bring this to life.

VOL 5
How To Develop A Signature Series

Image courtesies of @yeschef.supply, @thenitrobar_, @ondapastabar, and @mattchoi_6 via Instagram

House Recommendations: Sked Social

The Social Report Your Competitors Don't Want You To Read...

Here's the reality about the social landscape in 2026:

- The strategy shifted completely. And speed, volume, and quality matter more than ever.
- Owning a format is absolutely key.
- Concepts, formats, and content types are shifting.

It's all shifting.

Which means you need to approach social with a blank slate.

And understand that the best content will come from testing and data. From your like-to-save ratio to obsessing over your retention graph.

And all of that is covered in Sked's 2026 Social Media Forecast Report.

Where you'll learn every in and out you need to know to win on social over the next 12 months.

37 pages of need to know info. Not just good to knows.

Download here

There's a big difference between a "signature series" and a "social show."

A social show is a concept that lives on another account as a separate IP that you, as an individual or brand owns.

A "signature series" is a concept that lives on your main page but is scaled across multiple episodes.

One is a pillar within the content strategy on your main page.

The other is a strategy existing on a completely separate page/account.

Plus, a "signature series" is more budget-friendly for individuals and/or brands because they typically don't require all the steps like a social show.

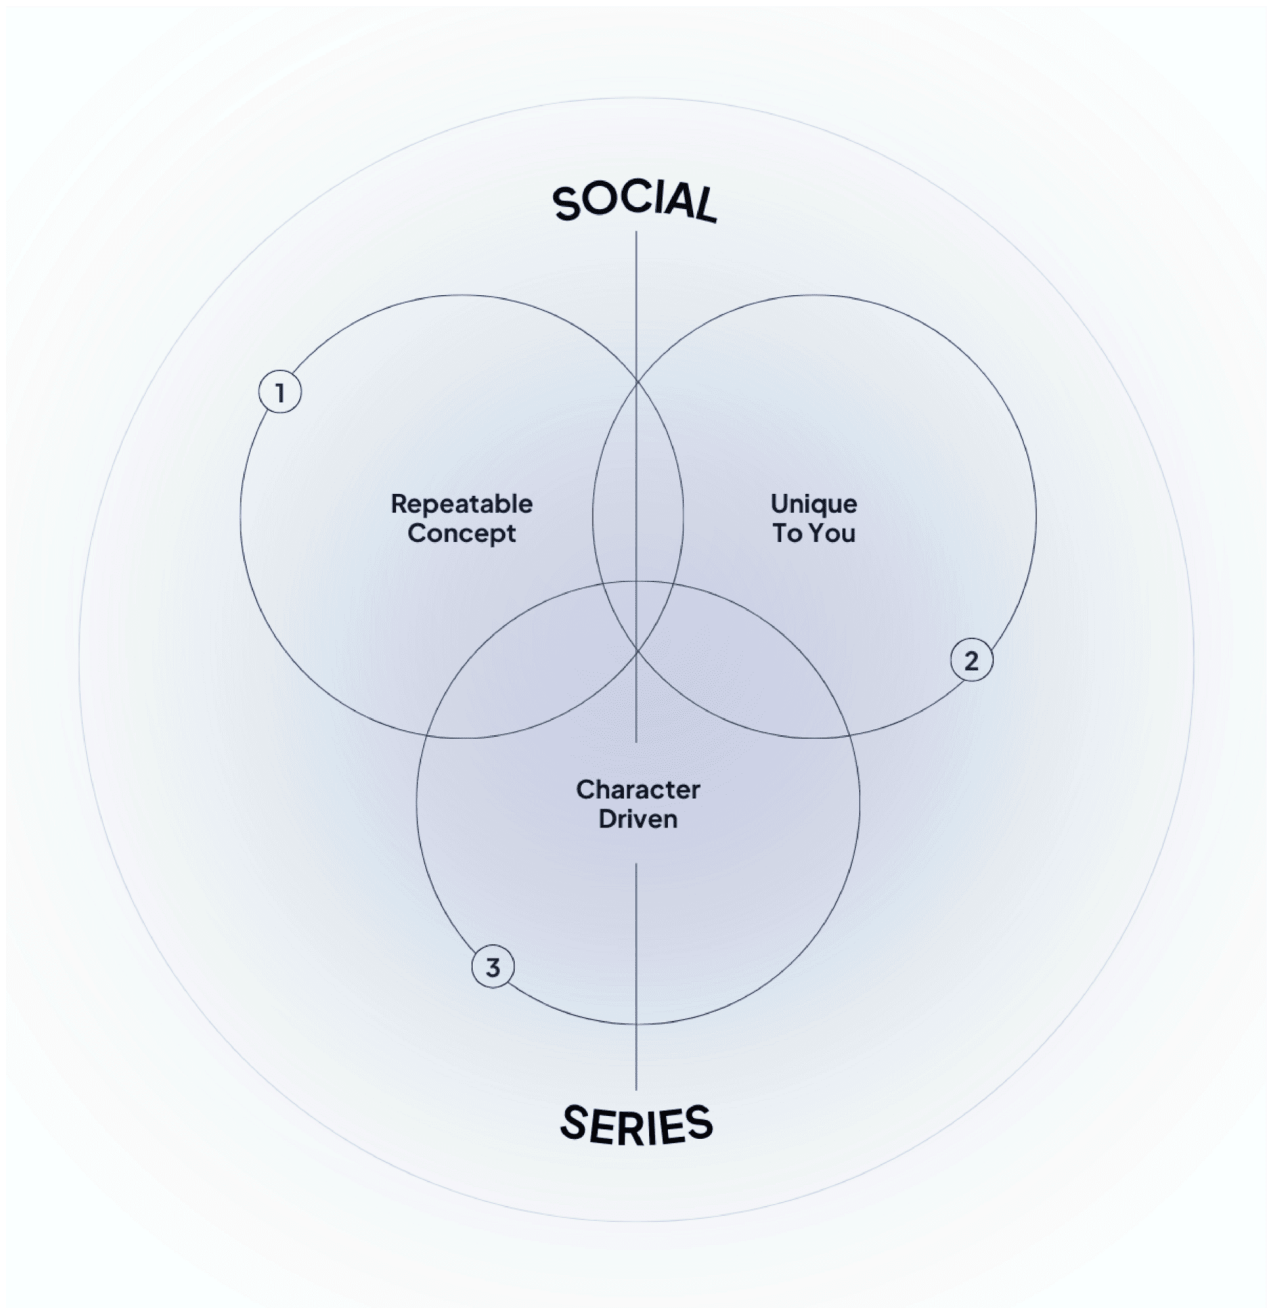

At the same time still a growth lever to pull for brands.

If you're a creator or brand and want to work with me, Colin Landforce, and Oren John to develop your signature series, then our next Cut30 live bootcamp starts 2/17.

...Back to signature series.

So, similar to social shows, a lot of the fastest-growing brands on social developed a signature series.

But there's a framework you need to follow to create a viral category signature series:

This is how you need to execute this.

1. Repeatable Concept

We talk about this weekly at this point. Because going into 2026, the most important thing you can develop as a brand is "familiarity." The ability to earn attention because you've earned recognition is unmatched.

And developing a repeatable concept does that.

So, to do this, you need to ideate around a concept you can scale infinitely, and friction is minimal.

Last week I spoke to Matt Choi about his Mile Challenge. In this signature series, every contestant he has sets a goal mile time, and he challenges them to hit that goal.

It's going on two years strong because of how frictionless it is to create.

It requires 15 min and one videographer on a scooter with an iPhone to film it.

On the other end, he had another signature series he had to dump, where he'd run 3 miles with someone and interview them and drop it as a short-form video.

But he cut it because there was too much friction.

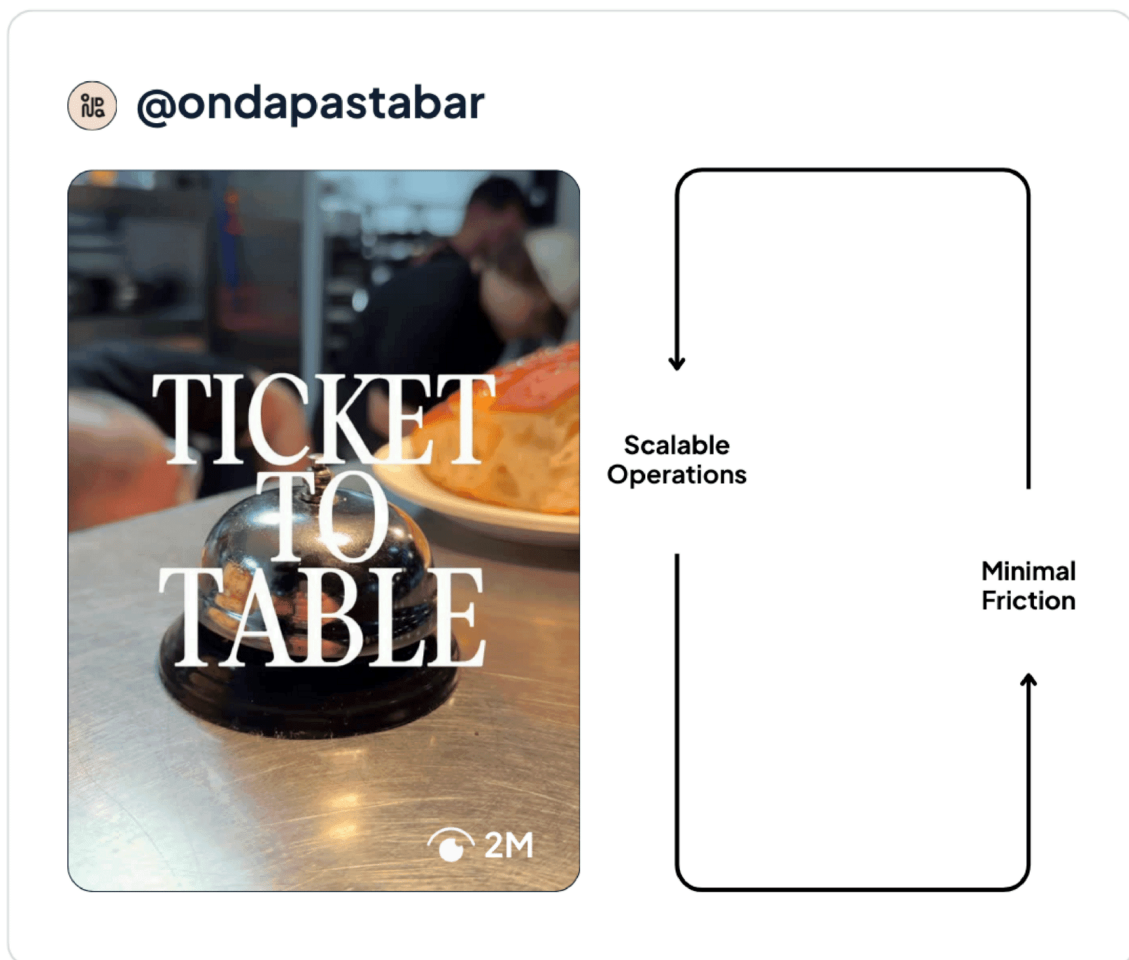

It required a full hour of filming, then cutting down an hour of footage into a great 45 sec to 1:30 clip. That friction led to ditching the idea and scaling the Mile Challenge.

Onda Bar - Ticket To Table

This is a great example of a signature series with a repeatable concept that racked up 2M views.

Because any cocktail, appetizer, entree, or dessert is an episode where Onda Bar can craft the ticket-to-table story.

On top of that, it has scalable operations (aka you can build a repeatable system around this) and minimal friction (aka you're documenting what already occurs).

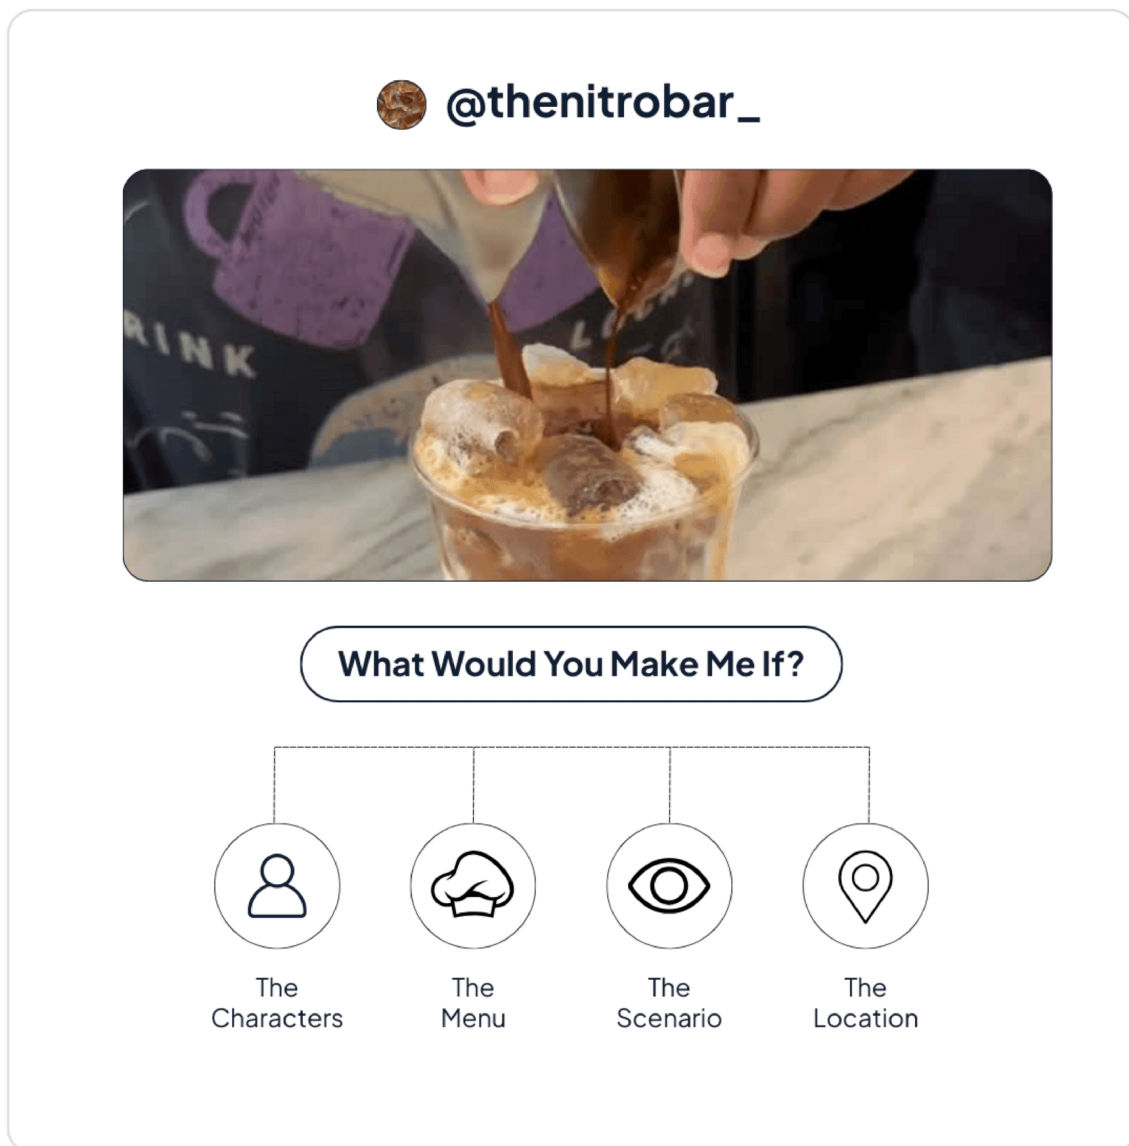

2. Unique To You

The easiest way to win a race is to be the only one running the race. This means conceptualizing a series that is one of one because of the uniqueness factor applied to it.

Nitro Bar's "What Would You Make Me If?" signature series is this to a T.

Four elements make the series unique to them:

- The Characters
- The Menu
- The Scenario
- The Location

These are the elements that others can't replicate. Therefore, it's vital to establish key pieces to the puzzle that are distinct and marked with your brand.

That way, the only one showing up to track to compete in the race on day 1 and day 90 is you.

3. Character Driven

On a tighter budget? Your characters are your staff, customers, or employees.

Have a bigger budget? You can factor in all of the above, plus creators, influencers, or actors, into your series.

But it's key for a character to be the vehicle of value. Because we don't only want familiarity around the series but affinity around the characters.

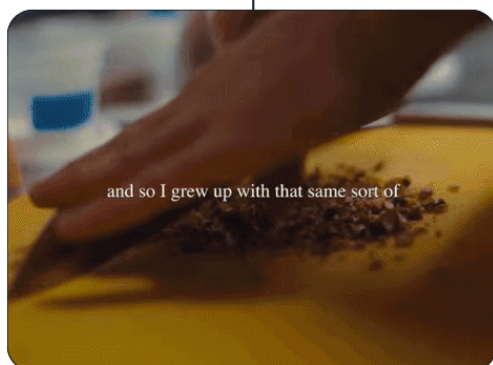

In this series by Yes Chef Supply called The Off Menu, they focus on different chefs creating different/specific dishes as the chef tells their story.

The Chef is the centerpiece. Everything is built around the chef, which gives the viewer reasons to feel connected to the chef.

@yeschef.supply

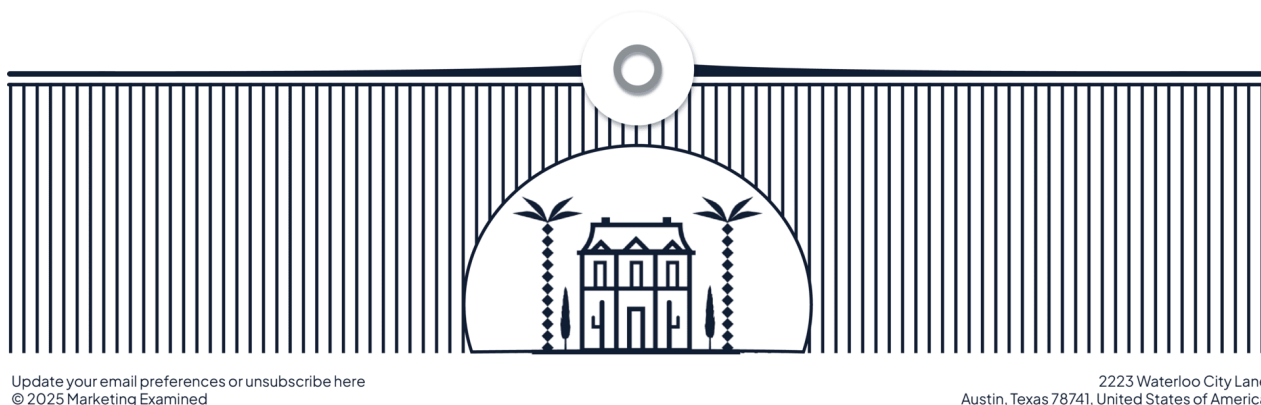

different chefs creating different/specific dishes as the chef tells their story

Combined, these are all the essential elements to create a bingeable signature series.

Until the next letter,

Alex Garcia | House Of Distribution

Update your email preferences or unsubscribe here

© 2026 Marketing Examined

2223 Waterloo City Lane
Austin, Texas 78741, United States

Powered by beehiiv